

CLINICAL ISSUES IN TREATING THE MALE SURVIVOR OF SEXUAL ABUSE

1. Reluctance To Seek Treatment

Male survivors are often less inclined to self-initiate therapy; they are more often “nudged” into therapy by a family member, friend, or partner. Males often compartmentalize their victimization to avoid or postpone dealing with the aftereffects directly.

2. Minimization Of The Experience Of Victimization

Cultural norms reinforce the perception that males cannot or should not be sexually victimized; some cultural norms even define early sexual experiences for males as “rites of passage” into adulthood.

3. Shame-Based Personality Dynamics

Protective armor may encase core “damaged goods” feelings; many men feel gender shame about powerlessness to protect themselves from victimization.

4. Exaggerated Efforts To Reassert Masculine Identity

Many male victims develop coping responses that are grounded in hyper-masculine attitudes/behaviors.

5. Fear Of Intimacy With Other Males

Boys and men frequently fear that acknowledgement of sexual victimization will be perceived by others as disclosure of homosexuality; vulnerable to coping strategy of extreme isolation from other males &/or intense homophobic attitudes/behaviors.

6. Confusion About Affectional/Sexual Preference

Many victims of same gender abuse struggle to separate learned sexual response patterns from core feelings of affectional/sexual preference.

7. Behavior Patterns That Reflect Power/Control Dynamics

Male victims may gravitate toward either end of the power/control continuum (i.e., either striving to be authoritarian or prone to passivity) in their style of interpersonal relationships.

8. Externalization Of Feelings

Male victims are susceptible to the male myth that it is O.K. to act on feelings but dangerous to feel feelings.

9. Vulnerability To Compulsive Behaviors

Compulsive behaviors are often disguised as within the context of socially acceptable masculine behavior – i.e., hyper-sexuality, submersion into work, strenuous exercise, ritualized use of food/alcohol, etc.

10. Fears That Sexual Victimization Creates Predisposition To Sexual Offending

While it is true that most sexual offenders have a history of sexual victimization, it is not true that most sexual victims become sexual offenders. However, it is common that males who acknowledge sexual victimization frequently encounter a “vampire syndrome” reaction.

Prepared By: Jim Struve, L.C.S.W.
 Salt Lake City, UT.
 www.mindfulpresence.com